

Dear FCCRecommend retaining a Morse Code Requirement for obtaining an Amateur Radio Operator License.

Rationale: 1. It provides a challenge, a goal to achieve, and once reached provides for a source of pride in accomplishment. Once the code test has been passed the candidate has truly LEARNED something, not simply memorized some answers. There is now something that will remain with the candidate for a long time.

A sense of belonging to a group that is "set apart" from the masses and belonging to a group that can provide a service to society, and they have achieved something that is unique.

2. The Multiple Choice Questions allow a candidate to study the question pools and pass the written examinations without LEARNING very much. After cramming for and passing the test, the questions and answers fade fast. Unlike the older ways of essay type answers, and no question pool. When one had to LEARN radio theory and regulations in order to answer several questions that the candidate had not heard before.

If the Morse Code requirement is eliminated, I strongly recommend that we adopt a requirement for some time to be spent at each License class prior to progressing to the next level.
